Enterprise WPA2 Password cracking is a fun challenge for hackers. This is the first step that you'll encounter when you're trying to crack a WiFi network. When you are presented with this challenge, enter your own WiFi credentials into that network in monitor mode, when you enter your own WiFi password you'll get a beautiful "welcome page" that shows you how many packets it had sniffed during the brute-force attack. In case the credentials are correct, it will show you a success message. It is very tedious as you have to go through a loop of entering this WiFi network's password until you get an open connection. This can take a lot of time and you can't even change the settings of this adapter. The only way to get this done is to use a dedicated monitor or use your PC's WiFi adapter in monitor mode. When you have an open connection, you will see how the WiFi adapter tries to connect, this is called SSID Discovery. You can see all the SSIDs available in range, like how it is shown above in a huge list of them. With this information, you can start sniffing for the correct credentials. Enter the credentials one by one and you will eventually get a successful connection. The RHEL 6.6 WiFi adapter is a good choice if you have an old KVM. Being an Intel adapter it supports 802.11a/b/g/n standards as well as the updated 802.11ac standard. One of the coolest things about this adapter is the fact that it supports monitor mode, which many other adapters don't have. It's also included in the RHEL 6.6 subscription and, in fact, very easy to get because they are all OEMs that simply ship the OEM's RHEL subscription disks. Feel free to hack WiFi networks using this old Intel adapter!

The model that supports 2.4 GHz max speeds of up to 450 Mbps and with the dual-antennas setup, it actually can deliver speeds up to 1,062 Mbps in 2.4 GHz. And that of course makes this the best wireless adapter for the Hackers. I am also happy to see that the newer version supports 802.11ac, which is where hackers move on to. Moreover, it is also suitable for use with both Windows and Linux, and it can even hack the WPA2 encryption. The ALFA AWUS036NH Wireless Adapter by ALFA has been the best one-off network adapter for Kali Linux with Dual Antennas and I have used it for a couple of months. In addition, I have used and tested the AWUS036AC on several trips.
